The old canal warehouses in Leeds stood empty for decades, until a group of former students, led by Ruth Okafor, turned the largest into a shared workshop. Membership is cheap, yet Ruth is blunt about the early months: only nine people joined, and several tools were stolen. What kept the project alive, she believes, was a decision to open the doors on Saturdays to anyone curious, free of charge. Visitors who came to watch frequently stayed to learn, and a number later became paying members. Ruth no longer measures success by income but by the number of broken things that leave the building repaired.

- a. What does Ruth admit about the first months? A interest was low B tools were costly C the building was unsafe D students lost interest
- b. What kept the project alive? A cheap membership B free Saturday openings C a company donation D visitor publicity
- c. What was one result of the free Saturdays? A some visitors later paid to join B tools were replaced C the rent fell D prices rose
- d. What does Ruth now see as the sign of success? A annual income B number of members C objects repaired D tools owned
